Ten Million Security Cameras to be Installed in China in 2010

In 2010, approximately ten percent of the Chinese security camera market revenues will come from the sale of network cameras. IMS Research has issued this forecast in the newly published report “The China market for CCTV and Video Surveillance Equipment – 2010 edition.”

More than 10 million security cameras will be shipped for domestic consumption in China in 2010. Network security cameras are forecast to account for only three percent of the market in terms of unit shipments. However, due to the higher average selling price than analogue security cameras, they are forecast to account for ten percent of total security camera market revenues in 2010.

The compound annual growth rate of network security cameras is forecast to be in excess of 40 percent between 2010 and 2014. Utilities and transportation are forecast to be the fastest growing markets for network security cameras over the next five years...Click here for full article.

CCID Consulting: Internet of Things, Beachhead in New Wave of Competition among Chinese Cities

The Wuxi City in eastern China's Jiangsu Province was undoubtedly the most extraordinary player in the area of the Internet of Things in 2009. Following Wuxi's suit, cities including Beijing, Shanghai, Fuzhou, Shenzhen, Guangzhou, Chongqing, Kunshan, Chengdu, and Hangzhou have also joined the first contingent for the development of the Internet of Things.

Thus a new wave of competition among Chinese cities has emerged after a recession of enthusiasm in the development of the information industry represented by PCs and the Internet.

Unlike the Pearl River Delta cities in Southern China which emerged as China's first information industry base due to their advantages in geographic location, cost and government policies, Wuxi is leading the new wave of the Internet of Things with both strong capabilities and aspirations...Click here for full article.
